"This was before we finally succeeded in getting the bodies. We picked up a machine gun prior to getting back at the scene of the murder, and got ready to do business before the bandits let us go about our work.

"It took about half an hour to pick up the 18 bodies and tond them into our cars. We got back into Chihushua city at 2.45 Tuesday morning, landing in the raticoad yards.

Rude coffins were made by the Americans in Chihuahua to contain the bodies of their murdered countrymen after the report and confirmation of their murder had reached the city of Chihuahua. The night that the train, from which the Americans had been taken and killed, returned to the city of Chihuahua the power plant of the city was shul down and the city was aleft in absolute durkness, adding to the centy was of the general feeling of the city, the horror of darkness and the wild rumors of the possible anti-American actions of the Villista sympathizers in the city, the Americans spent a night of alarm, gathered together in the Foreign ciub of the city. There were about 100 Americans, of which three were women.

Nothing had been left in the baggange car of the train but one old suit case. Of the five dosa that were taken by the Americans on the trip four returned, but one, a fine white buildog, was badly hurt, having been anot through the back. The buildog and an Airdule dog belonged to C. E. Watson. Tuesday was spent by the Americans in preparing the coffins.
